AIMS AND SCOPE

The International Journal of Digital & Analog Cabled Systems provides a new forum for research and development in the fast growing area of cabled systems. Published quarterly, it is intended to fill a gap by providing in one journal a common source of information on systems linked together by the common theme of using cable as their primary transmission means (over conventional copper, and increasingly by fibre).

The Journal will regularly address the following key applications: • Business communications (LANs and MANs) • Cable TV networks • Residential communications (e.g. Home buses) • Telecommunications networks. The Journal will aim to publish serious in-depth contributions in the above, or similar, areas thus allowing the reader to benefit from experiences, problems, and solutions described, which will often have useful application across into other network types. It should also become an invaluable source from which to identify emerging principles and trends, again with commonality across the above areas, and indeed it should chronicle an increasing integration of the functions of different applications into multi-service networks.

Papers will cover the following cabled systems aspects:
- Specific system descriptions (design and implementation)
- Network architectures
- Relevant equipment developments (e.g. optical links)
- Enabling technologies (e.g. optical components, LSI chips) and techniques (e.g. video coding)
- Services provided

In addition to novel work, tutorial and review articles will be featured. Special issues covering particular themes are also planned.
